

About the Washington National Guard JAG

The Judge Advocate General is the legal branch of the U.S. Army. They provide legal council and a court system for soldiers. This JAG office near Seattle serves the Washington National Guard.

Their Need

The last JAG building was built in 1982 and was initially of poor quality. Over the years it became apparent that it was more cost effective to replace the deteriorated old building with a modern structure. The JAG office also needed greater space to handle a modern workload, and they wanted a building that would match newer construction on the post..

Our Solution

The 1,800 square foot building incorporated an exterior of brick wainscoting with a stucco-like wall system surrounding large arched windows. Security systems and internal communication systems provided the organization with systems that would meet long-term needs. It was ready in less than
