Award winning building

Their Need

Williams had expanded operations significantly over the past twenty years. They had simply outgrown their original offices and need additional space to service a growing national network. They required a modular building of the first quality to show the state-of-the-art in modular construction. The building would be seen on marketing materials, on their web site and would be pointed to as the quintessential example of their product and the highest in modular construction.

Our Solution

The initial building was 35,000 square feet with a stucco exterior, a curved façade and bent windows. It presented a sleek, modern look to visitors. The foyer was finished in marble, chrome, tile, architectural glass and exotic woods. The interior presented an image of sophistication and permanence to further impress potential customers. Later, two wings were added to house a growing staff. Electrical work facilitated a soaring demand for computer power, while other mechanicals and fixtures balanced style and function. The building remains a showcase of the best in modular construction.
