Whitley constructed this daycare facility for the Smithsonian Institute, on the National Mall in Washington, D.C. For the Institute, time was of the essence, as they needed to complete their move within the span of a few days, over holiday break.

In only 120 days, Whitley produced a facility that met all of their needs, without disrupting any of the childcare programs. The Smithsonian recognized that construction upheaval would be detrimental to the children.

When the town of Wellesley needed a pre-kindergarten child care facility - they turned to Whitley Manufacturing. Their building site had both noise and drainage issues, and the residents wanted a building that fit with the unique architecture of the neighborhood. Along with HMFH Architects, Whitley produced this head-turning design. The interior was thoughtfully designed and decorated with children in mind, as were the private restrooms installed in each class area. Whitley can handle any project, from a large facility like Wellesley, to a small daycare provider.
